Summarizing Information

Directions: Read the passage below, and then answer the questions.

The rise of industrialism in Northern Europe set in motion many changes. First, people were needed to work in factories. Therefore, more people moved to the cities where factories were located. This migration to cities and factory jobs led to new social classes. The political structure of Northern Europe changed, too, as people brought new ideas such as democracy and independence to the Northern European countries. In the period following World War II, the Nordic countries developed as democracies.
